One to One Naruto [PC Game] dna hackFor years, people have been asking what it will be like to live in a Googleplex, or to have such resources available to you at your fingertips. The first “real-world” use of Google Glass is about to begin at Burning Man (and by extension, all of us will soon be able to play with the next cool technological developments). But there are ways to get a glimpse into what life with a Glass would be like, and the role it will play in our future. Google is providing a “meeting room” on their Google Campus in Mountain View where you can try on a pair of Google Glass and share in the conversations. You can see them in action by watching this video. Having worked with Google Glass for the last year and a half, I’m not surprised to see that this project is coming together quickly. But the technology still isn’t ready for mainstream users and the experience is still a work in progress. At this point, we’re still limited to people who are smart, courteous and willing to cooperate and play nicely with others. Google Glass is a fantastic tool to use when you’re in the company of other people, but it won’t replace a good conversation. The key is that you can’t take a conversation off-line and back on line again. People have to be willing to put down their smartphones to have an enjoyable conversation with others. Asking others to give up their smartphones and tablets is a hard sell for many people. The Glass user must ask people to give up those devices and instead interact with a small screen on the side of their glasses. They can ask to take a photo, search the internet, share a document or text, look up directions, or check the time or weather. The Glass is also more socially acceptable than a smartphone or tablet because you don’t have to hold it up or point it at someone or they might feel uncomfortable with the novelty. The experience is different from most other mobile technologies because there’s a noticeable lag 2d92ce491b
