Overview: The application easily lists events and stored information of selected time. The data of the event are simultaneously displayed in a table list, sorted by every time or in a directory tree, depending on the choice of the user. A detailed information window gives specific data about selected events. Find running processes, programs, services and more. The application also allows setting individual priority levels for each running process. This helps to define the process load by the system. The process information and running time is easily customizable and settable. Click on your chosen event to view detailed information on the properties window. Entering or modifying of data in the properties window takes you to a form where you can change the data or create a new one. Create detailed event reports and export them to various file formats. The properties window helps you to work with events in all time intervals. The event log can be exported in a number of formats, like CSV, TXT or XML. The application does not interrupt the services of the system. It uses minimum amount of system resources, so you don't need to worry about the system downtime. The program runs on computers with Windows 2000, Windows 2003, Windows Vista, Windows 7,

Windows 8 or Windows 8.1. This utility is extremely useful on computers with a graphical system. The application is designed with simple navigation and a friendly interface. New York State Court of Appeals has issued a rule allowing digital camera owners to continue using their cameras, instead of being forced to return them when police officers come looking for them. The police are increasingly turning to the Digital Image Recording Act to seize digital media from citizens, after the law was passed back in 1996. The new rule could offer some breathing room. The state courts' announcement came as the New York Civil Liberties Union's interest group advocates for the use of the act. In a news release the organization praised NYCLU Senior Staff Attorney Christine Suny for preparing the petition. "I am very pleased the Court of Appeals has issued this ruling," Suny said. "While it's always good news when a court rule offers protection for civil liberties in our free society, it is particularly vital for camera owners who are often subject to police warrantless searches of their private property," Suny continued. When pursuing a warrant, officers are allowed to search through an individual's things in their immediate proximity. However, when the police are looking to carry out a warrant, they are legally allowed to search far outside an individual's immediate vicinity. Digital cameras are often found in areas that could be considered close proximity. They are designed to be held and operated by users, in close quarters. "While the new court rule does not provide the strongest protection for digital cameras, it does make it easier for us to continue representing people in these types of cases," Suny said.

The Reserve Bank of India (RBI) today said it has struck a deal to recycle old Rs 500 and Rs 1,000 notes, with Rs 3,000 to the private sector for any project. In a move to ease the liquidity situation in the system, the central bank will borrow only about Rs 1.5 lakh crore from stock market, bankers, housing finance companies and small finance banks for this. The first list of beneficiaries of this debt, or non-cash finance, includes a few big firms like IPL franchisees, but also many small and medium enterprises. The government and the RBI, which is the main agency to recycle old notes, did not disclose any benchmark or base price for projects that can benefit from the money. Many companies, however, believe the cost will be in the ballpark of Rs 3,000 per transaction, which is much less than the Rs 12,000 it costs a bank to conduct such a transaction. While there is no clarity on the number of bills to be recycled, most experts agree that the value of old Rs 500 and Rs 1,000 notes with over Rs 6.5 lakh crore of hoarded currency is in the
