Experience with surgical management of 157 patients with arterial intracranial aneurysms (IAA) operated on over the last 16 years is analyzed. The localization of the aneurysms was located on the vertebro-basilar segment (46.7%), middle cerebral (29.1%) and anterior cerebral (11.8%) arteries. There were also four patients with aneurysms of posterior communicating and posterior choroidal arteries. The relationship between the size and frequency of the IAA and clinical features was estimated. The majority of the patients were operated within 3 months after the first bleeding episode. Emergency operation (within 3 days after the first manifestation of the disease) was performed in 62 patients (40.5%). In case of angiographically verified occlusion of a parent artery the subarachnoid hemorrhage (SAH) was a contraindication for endovascular interventions. The decision on the final treatment plan was based on the aneurysm size, site of the aneurysm, the number of previous operations for aneurysm and the patient's condition. The largest aneurysms located in the middle cerebral and anterior cerebral arteries were removed by carotid-intracerebral bypass using the superficial temporal artery (STA) in case of contralateral carotid occlusion. Forty-three patients had a successful occlusion of the parent artery. There were 14 patients with improvement in the neurological status, and in one patient the neurological status remained unchanged. A successful endovascular occlusion was performed in 12 patients with a preexisting carotid occlusion. Ten patients were operated on the second time. The majority of the patients who had a first operation (76.9%) were operated on again within the first 3 months after the first operation. Aneurysms located on the vertebro-basilar artery were removed through the transcallosal approach using retrosigmoid approach for the subtemporal portion and the retrolab
