

If you are on Windows and have an antivirus that warns you about a possible infection: be aware that this is a false positive because all scripts are double-checked. As Malcolm Gladwell says: "A simple analysis of error messages in programs" ([207 - Mullen Gladwell. Probing the Curse: The Unintended Consequences of the Internet of Things (New York: Basic Books, 2012).]), imagine that the scripts that indicate the presence of viruses were implemented in a program that really and only really and only currently loaded. In fact, this is all a hoax, because 100 percent of on-demand bug tests don't come close to 0 percent of bugs in real applications. It would seem that adding antivirus databases and application detectors to the sandbox might reduce the relevance of such false positives to security. If so, why not protect programs as soon as they are created? Unfortunately, this actually increases the risk of infection, as viruses often spread across multiple instances of a program. Moreover, if your distribution environment contains millions or even billions of program instances, there may be so many viruses in them that it becomes difficult to control each program. Regardless of exactly how it works (that is, how control over each instance of the program is achieved), you may be forced to allow malware to spread through your program. The probability of infection of the program when using the sandbox is lower than the probability of infection when using the full version, so if you are against the introduction of full control over the program, then it is better to install an antivirus version that will protect your program from all threats that do not completely eliminate the possibility of infection. 1.3.2 When should backups be maintained? During the startup process, new software tries to make itself work. If you manage to forget the administrator password and incorrect credentials, the system can begin to protect itself from intrusion by automatically requesting authorization. This will take some time, so from time to time the system will try to update, because it will not have the right to access the files responsible for executing programs without first making changes to it. These changes may not be compatible with the current version of the program. In fact, often this will mean that the processor power management module driver that is responsible for loading the program does not meet the requirements. In such a case, you will have to manually install the new driver. Otherwise, the program will just terminate its
