By Jennie Putnam, CEO, EMERGENT THERAPEUTICS My PhD work in chemical biology focused on the dissection of the function of peptide hormones like angiotensin II and bradykinin. I was awarded the Samuel Gee thesis award for research excellence in my field, and went on to work in publishing, and pharmacy before joining EMERGENT THERAPEUTICS in 2015. After the sale of the "functional food" business from EMERGENT THERAPEUTICS to Est, the founding company of Danone, I joined EMERGENT THERAPEUTICS as its CEO. How would you describe your career to someone who is just joining your field? I started out as an independent academic, but after five years running a successful academia spin-out company, I decided to move into industry. This time, I was convinced that the key to take great ideas to the market was to build a company around them and develop my own. This period at EMERGENT THERAPEUTICS has been great because it has been a perfect combination of technology transfer and entrepreneurship. We have built a beautiful company while growing profits from €3 to €16 million in our 14 years of history. We still have opportunities to improve the business, and we are confident that EMERGENT THERAPEUTICS is now positioned to enter the next phase of its life as a global leader. What are the biggest challenges you are facing today? I am proud of our growth for the last five years. Today, we are doing business in 15 countries and have employees in more than a dozen different countries. We are the first company with the technology to allow non-smokers to breathe in a cigarette, a revolution for the public health and a major opportunity for the company. Our shareholders have been terrific and our market cap for less than 15 years is about €7 billion, we have a strong balance sheet, and we are ready to scale up. However, there are still challenges that we have to face, and these are the core elements of our current strategy: We have to learn to work together in a more coordinated way, to manage the company's affairs well, and to better communicate with our stakeholders. We have to improve our operational efficiency, develop our pipeline of products, and build a strong team of talented and creative scientists. We are a small company and we need to leverage human capital to get maximum value for our Golden State Warriors veteran head coach Steve Kerr said that he'd "absolutely" consider a return to coaching, if he was offered the job again. Kerr will be among the top names of candidates to replace Mike Brown as the new head coach of the Cleveland Cavaliers. "What makes me like coaching is just the competitive nature of it," Kerr said Friday at the Kerr Leadership Conference at the MGM Grand in Las Vegas. "There's just something about running a team." "In my mind, I've already been here," Kerr said. "I've been doing it for the last 13 years. You're ready for it again. My parents can make it happen, so it's not like I have to figure out how to move my family around." Several candidates have said they would stay in their current coaching jobs, including former Los Angeles Clippers head coach Doc Rivers and Houston Rockets assistant Kelvin Sampson. The Warriors have struggled this season, going 9-14 in the first half of the season. After the All-Star break, the Warriors went 2-3, with losses to the San Antonio Spurs, Denver Nuggets and Houston Rockets./* * Copyright (c) 2018 THL A29 Limited, a Tencent company.
