The major biological actions of insulin and IGF-I are the regulation of cell growth and metabolism in somatic cells. Although their biological roles are well established and they have been thoroughly studied in many tissues, their precise biochemical and physiological actions in bone and skeletal muscle are still to be established. There is evidence that IGF-I and IGF binding proteins are important in the regulation of both muscle structure and function. The interactions between the IGF system and the skeleton are shown to be important in the regulation of the interaction between skeletal muscle and bone in development and in response to injury. The work
