The orbits of Saturn's moon Titan are perturbed in part by the presence of a distant moon, Enceladus. I will show that Titan's eccentricity is significantly decreased when the Enceladus orbit is included. The source of this decrease is tidal heating: Titan is heated by tidal friction, and the increased heat flux (i.e., dissipation rate) drives a flow of dissipated energy that diminishes the eccentricity. The characteristic phase lag, amplitude, and timing of this eccentricity decrease are quantitatively determined by the orbit of Enceladus.Q: Bash script: How to parse the string?
