Q: Is it safe to kill an NSThread inside its own NSThread's completion block? Is it safe to kill an NSThread inside its own NSThread's completion block, or is there a more appropriate way to dismiss its own NSThread? I have a custom NSThread subclass that does a lot of work on behalf of the main application. While this work is being done, I want to make a call to the main thread, where the main thread can either dismiss the custom thread completely or ask it to stop. If I were just to call terminateAllThreads on the main thread, I would risk terminating all the NSThread's that the main thread created. Therefore, I thought it would be safer to take advantage of the completion block and either call `terminateAllThreads()` myself, or ask it to send the message itself. Is this the correct way to do things, or am I stepping on a dangerous ground somewhere? Update: Apparently, calling `terminateAllThreads()` from within the thread's completion block will cause a crash, so I will have to do it from the main thread. This is not ideal, but it would be acceptable. A: Yes. `NSThreads` have no problem for when they create themselves and self terminate them. For example, `NSRunLoop` is a subclass of `NSThread`, and `NSRunLoop` is a subclass of `NSOperation`.
