RITM (railway) The RITM (Russian abbreviation, commonly called the RABeM) is an automated metro train system serving Moscow in Russia. It was introduced for the Moscow Metro in 2015. It operates on the Zamoskvorechiy Line as well as the other lines in the system that were not built before the system was introduced. The system is designed by the Russian company RAZEX. On the Zamoskvorechiy Line, RITMs will replace the up-to-date L3000 electric multiple unit trains (EMU) that entered service in 2006. On the other lines, the existing trains will be adapted to run in the automated mode. The system is planned to use the same automated platform as in the RER in Paris, the Transport for London Underground in the United Kingdom and the Stockholm Metro. The system is supplied by Siemens and its software is developed by the Russian company RAZEX.

History Development Testing and operation on a limited basis commenced in early 2013 in Moscow. The line was selected to be among the first lines in the Moscow Metro with automation introduced in Russian cities. The testing of the line was completed in 2014, the agreement was signed between the Russian and German companies and its launch was planned for early 2015. The system is designed to allow S-train routes on other lines to be automated. In an attempt to speed up the implementation schedule for the project, a special train was created in Moscow and the Moscow train factory was set to produce the units that will be used. The trains were tested and equipped with the system software. When the Siemens software and hardware was delivered and tested in Moscow in December 2014, the system was ready for the delivery and testing in December 2015. The first official trial run took place in February 2016. Moscow Metro proposed plan With the introduction of the RITM, the Moscow Metro proposed plan was completed. The plan includes L3000 trains on the lines that can be used in the automated mode, replacing the up-to-date EMUs. Further plans include introduction of RITMs on other lines where
